FROM THE HAMBURGH MAIL.

CONSTANTINOPLE, APRIL 20.

ON the 14th, immediately after the arrival of a Courier from St. Petersburgh, a conference took place between the Russian Ambassador and the Reis Effendi, which, coupled with the assembling of the Turkish troops, has given rise to various reports.

Zengg, April 27. Yesterday the march of another corps of 11 or 12,000 French troops was announced. They are to pass through this place in three divisions; a circumstance which has produced an uncommon rise in the price of provisions. To furnish the French armies in Dalmatia with meat all the neighbouring islands have been ordered to send their spare cattle to Zara.

Copenhagen, May 20. Very few ships now pass the Sound, on which account the town of Helsingor suffers considerably. — An English gun-brig, on its return from the Baltic, sailed for the North Sea on the 13th. A Russian ship of the line, that lately left this road, is on shore near Faulsted, but, it is thought, the will be got afloat again.

From the Main, May 17. The confiscation of the English merchandise in Switzerland has already occasioned a considerable division between the Cantons; those of Basle, Solothurn, Argau, Zurich, and Thurgau, whose trade is considerably injured, wish to unite with France. The rest, however, protest against this union, though most of them suffer much from a scarcity of horned cattle, and accuse the former of exposing the independence of Switzerland. Both parties have sent Deputies to Paris. A vast quantity of goods have been sent from Basle and Zurich to Luzern, Schwitz, Altorf, and Chur; but the Governments of these Cantons refusing to admit them, they were sent back again to the places from whence they came.

LONDON, June 3.

A circumstance has occurred which has served to inflame, to an extraordinary degree, the animosity which the democratic faction in America have excited against this country. On the 25th of April an American seaman was killed by a chance shot fired at a coasting sloop of war in with Sandy Hook, by the Leander man of war. From the depositions of the Masters of the sloop and of a brig it appears that the Leander fired at the sloop and other vessels to bring them to.—The two first shots did not touch the sloop, which still continued her course, and did not bring to. About five minutes after the two first shots were fired another shot unfortunately struck the man at the helm, and killed him. This distressing occurrence afforded a favourable opportunity to the violent democratic faction. No sooner had the vessel on board of which the man was killed arrived at New York, than the populace rushed to the water's edge, took the body of the seaman from on board the sloop, and paraded it through the streets, uttering the most violent language, accompanied with the most frantic gestures against Great Britain. The fury of the populace communicated itself to the merchants, who immediately assembled, and manned and armed several pilot boats and other vessels, which were instantly dispatched to re-capture any American vessels which might have been taken by the British squadron, and to bring them into New York.—A quantity of fresh provisions, purchased in the market for the use of the British ships, was flopped by the mob, and carried in triumph to the Alms House. A public funeral was decreed to the seaman killed, the public papers were put in mourning, and the Grand Jury of New York actually found a Bill against the Captain of the Leander for murder. — Since the above New York papers of the 4th ult. have arrived. They do not contain any more particulars relative to the above unhappy transaction.

Letters brought by the Mail from Lisbon, of the 18th ult. state, that a Treaty, guaranteeing the neutrality of Portugal, was signed at Madrid on the 19th of April, by the Plenipotentiaries of France and Portugal. When the packet which brought the Mail was under way from the Tagus, a letter was put on board her, which mentions, that "a squadron had arrived on the Spanish Main, and taken possession of Cumana and Barcelona, and that the whole province was expected to fall."

This squadron is Miranda's, which is said to have arrived on the Spanish Main, and actually taken possession of the Island of St. Margarita, where he had been joined by three or four thousand of the inhabitants, with whom, and the force he brought with him, he intended to make an attempt to revolutionise the neighbouring Spanish settlements.

By Captain Webb, of the brig Eliza, who arrived at Philadelphia on the 27th of April from Maricaibo, intelligence was received, that orders had arrived there, from the Governor of Carracas, to have the Militia immediately organised, and the city put into the best state of defence, as a very alarming revolt had taken place in the interior. The object of the insurgents was supposed to be connected with the expedition under General Miranda.

The Anna Prinzon, Captain Helm, from Canton for Copenhagen, is arrived off Dover. By her we learn, that the Coutts, Windham, Hope, Exeter, Warley, Cumberland, Ocean, Royal George, Bombay Castle, Wexford, and the Henry Addington, East Indiamen, from England, are arrived at China.

Two ships of 74 guns each, building at Woolwich and Deptford, will be completed for launching the latter end of the Summer: They are to be named the Invincible and Bombay.

Mr. Colclough is elected a Knight of the shire for the county of Wexford.

On Thursday afternoon as Mr. Nettleby, of the Borough, was crossing Botley Hill, he was accosted by two very genteel persons, who entered into conversation with him, and kept in his company till they got to an unfrequented spot, when they demanded his purse, offering, that imperious necessity compelled them to take such an unpleasant method of raising a loan, which they would probably in a short time repay with interest. They then robbed him of his purse, containing 40l. of which they returned him 5l.

An unfortunate affair happened in Falmouth Harbour on Sunday fe'nnight. As some men were attempting to escape from the hired armed ship Humber, in contempt of the threats of the Lieutenant of that ship, who repeatedly declared he would fire upon them if they did not return, that officer discharged a musket, and shot one of them through the heart. The Coroner's Jury, who investigated the affair, returned a verdict—Accidental Death.

HOUSE OF COMMONS, Monday, June 2.

Lord H. Petty said, that it had been found necessary to omit introducing any exemptions to persons of small fortune, and with large families, into the Property Bill which had lately passed, in order to prevent any embarassment in the operation of that Bill. But this omission did not proceed from any want of feeling for the situation of such persons; and he now gave notice of his intention to move for a Bill exempting persons of that description, which would not be liable to objection, either in point of principle or of execution.

Lord H. Petty also gave notice, with regard to the tax on Private Brewers, that as it was never meant to introduce the Excise into private families, it was his intention to omit that part of the Bill which authorised an Excise duty on Private Brewers; but it would be necessary that the resolutions on which the Bill was founded should be altered in a Committee of Ways and Means on Friday; the Bill could not therefore be submitted to the House before the early part of next week.

Mr. Percival wished to know how the Noble Lord would be able to ascertain who were Private Brewers, and who were not.

Lord H. Petty replied, that every person making a return under the Assessed Taxes, would be required to state, whether or not he brewed his own beer.

On the motion of Mr. Windham, the House then resolved itself into a Committee on the Mutiny Bill, and resumed the consideration of the new clauses introduced into it. After some conversation,

Lord Castlereagh rose to state his objection to the clause appointing a limitation of service. The present clause appeared to him a serious infringement on the undoubted prerogative of the crown, neither warranted by the times, nor becoming in those who proposed it. Having stated his objections to the clause as unconstitutional, he made some observations on the leading features of the measure which was now introduced. It began by repealing a measure that had already been productive, and promised to be more so, and would end with diminishing our veteran battalions, and reducing the militia almost to nothing. It was always understood to be of importance, that our military force should be of such a nature, as might be disbanded on the return of peace, and easily re-assembled in time of war. Of this nature was the militia, and also the Additional Force which his late Right Hon. Friend had raised; but the present plan would bring our peace and war establishment to a kind of equality. Besides the waste, the expence would be enormous. The annual expences that this system would occasion he calculated as follows: 380,000l. for the bounties to the recruits who were to replace those that went out; 162,000l. for the additional pay to the men in the second period; 792,000l. annually for the pensions of those who had served their 14 years, and 684,000l. for those who had served 21 years. He was also much afraid that the veteran soldiers would feel great discontent at young recruits meeting terms so much more advantageous than those under which they were enlisted.

Mr. Grattan thought the fears of the Noble Lord, of the measure producing discontent among the veterans, appeared to him entirely groundless. They had already repeatedly seen large numbers of men raised under different Acts of Parliament for limited service, and yet it never occasioned mutiny or discontent. Their pay had since that time been considerably increased. To improve the condition of the soldier was, in his opinion, going a great way to improve their excellence and value as an army. An army which was badly constituted, was too strong for the laws of the country, but too weak for the enemy. The armies of France were taken from the very flower of its population, and it would be a great mistake to suppose that the flower of the French nation could be opposed and beaten by the refuse of the English nation. Our army should be so constituted, that the flower of our nation should be opposed to the flower of their's. He also approved of the subsidiary part of the plan, which went to train the people of England to arms, and martialize the spirit of the country. He concluded by expressing an opinion, that under such a system as was proposed, the country would be invincible.

The Master of the Rolls said, the present clause was incongruous with the whole tenor of the Mutiny Bill; that was to augment the powers of his Majesty; but this was to restrict those powers. The Right Hon. Gent. (Mr. Windham) presumed, although the soldiers had a right to be discharged, that they would not avail themselves of such a right. It was too much in the Right Hon. Gent. to expect, that in the absence of all proof his predictions were to be substituted for facts.

The Solicitor-General said, in this Bill a clause was proposed limiting military service to seven years, and it was to be asserted, that such a clause in such a Bill was unconstitutional! But this was not to be done in a Mutiny Bill. If it were to be abrogated, how could it more conveniently be introduced than into an annual Bill? The most extraordinary argument was, that it was dangerous to the constitution to enlist soldiers for a limited time. Did gentlemen remember how jealous the natives of this island had always been of a standing army in the best times of our history? He then quoted the sentiments of a great and learned Judge, (Blackstone) according to whose principles nothing ought to be more guarded against in a free state, than making the military power, when such a one is necessary to be kept on foot, a body too distinct from the people. Like our's, it should wholly be compoled of natural subjects; it ought only to be enlisted for a short and limited time; the soldiers also should live intermixed with the people; no separate camp, no barracks, no inland fortresses, should be allowed. And, perhaps, it might be still better, if, by dismissing a stated number, and enlisting others at every renewal of their term, a circulation could be kept up between the army and the people, and the citizen and the soldier be more intimately connected together.

Sir William Lemon, after expressing his high approbation and warmest thanks for the very constitutional speech this night by the Solicitor-General, said, he had ever thought a large standing army a great grievance to the country; and, if there were a necessity for its existence, it was desirable to have it upon principles as constitutional as possible.

The question upon the original motion being put, the numbers for the clause were 206—Noes 105—Majority 101.—Adjourned.

The Works of Dr. Franklin have been often partially collected, but never before brought together in one uniform Publication.—In the present Volumes will be found all the different Collections, together with the various Papers of the same Author that have been published in separate Pamphlets, or inserted in Foreign Collections of his Works, or in the Transactions of our own, or of Foreign Philosophical Societies, or in our own or Foreign Newspapers and Magazines, as far as discoverable by the Editor, who has been assisted in the research by a Gentleman in America. Among these Papers some we conceive will be new to the English Reader on this Side the Atlantic.

As above may be had, just published,

A new and improved Edition, elegantly printed in Two Volumes, Fcap 8vo. with a Portrait, Price 8s. Boards, of the LIFE and ESSAYS of BENJAMIN FRANKLIN, LL.D.
