The Jame orders are to be extended to all the Ruffian ports, where there are any English fips. No injunction has yet been laid on English property. Ruffia persists in maintaining, in concert with Pruffia, the free right of navigation, and the principle of convoys.

Letters from Berlin mention that Louis Bonaparte will certainly go from thence to Petersburg. The French are about to give up all the Ruffian prisoners of war in their custody; and for this purpose the Ruffian General Spreng-porten, who is actually at Berlin, is going to Bruffels to take an account of them, and give the necessary orders for their release.
