ant. rane prought up the report of the Bill, and moved that the clause regulating the mode of assessment of the tolk to the poors-rates should be no longer part of the bill. On the question being put
Mr. Lockhart observed, that though it was not usual to address the House on clauses contained in year the list agreed the abandoued, yethe could not suffer this clause even to be rejected, without some observation. When private bills contain matter of the highest public concern, they fifly become the object of caution and discrission. The clause now abandoned contained matter teading to effect on the line of the canal, a complete change of the established law of the land, on the assessment of tolks to parochial rates, and under the assumption of preventing litigation, and of more equally distributing that assessment amongst the various parishes through which the line extended, it proposed to take away a fund from many populous places, a fand vested in them by law, and dedicated to the maintenance of that poor, which the indux of inhabitants occasioned by the canal, and with which interjacent parishes were not other consummant trade necessarily foreight with it, and with which interjacent parishes were not of this clause on the City of Oxford, which he had on the clause his most decided of all it remained part of the bild, he should have fell this here all the provisions of the nature of the clause in question—of such extended into practe bills, and still more how dangeress the nature that it is no other member for the provisions of the nature this magnitude ought to be introduced into practe bills, and still more how dangeress the practe bills, and still more how dangeress the proposal stage of discussion, without their in bills of much less consequence, and re-aining only to the inclosure or exchange of land. LONDON, MARCH 4.

Some interesting information was last night given in the House of Commons, by Mr. Wellesley Tole, in reply to the unfounded accusations brought against the admiralty, with regard to the state of that force, by which it appears that the squadron were amply provided with provisions and stores.—So far from Sri Richard Stratan's having been prevented pursuing the enemy, he is now probably far up the Mediterranean, laving received intelligence of the enemy having steered that course.—Thus do all the unfounded accusations in this respect completely fall to the ground.

There were again long but uninteresting debates in both Houses last night. In the Lords, a motion of censure in respect to the Copenhagen expedition was made by Lord Darnley, and negatived by a great majority; while, on the other hand, a vote of approbation, moved by Lord Elliot, was carried by a still greater majority. In the Commons, several divisions took place upon various subjects, and the house sat to a late hour.

OXFORD,

SUMMARY OF POLITICS.

Intelligence from several parts of the continent bave reached town, but it is not of much impor-tance. Buonaparte is said to have set out for Bour-deaux, where he has been expected some time, and from whence it was supposed he would proceed to Madrid, and probably to Lisbon. The French de-cree is now, it appears, executed with as much rigour towards the inhabitants of the United States as the subjects of the most hostile powers. The latest accounts from France mention, that a vessel from New York to Hamburgh, has been seized and car-rigour towards the inhabitants of the United States accounts from France mention, that a vessel from New York to Hamburgh, has been seized and carried into Dieppe, which had not had any communication with a British port or cruizer.

The orders prohibiting any intercourse whatever, under any circumstances, with the vessels of this country, are executed in Holland with a degree of savage rigour, quite congenial with the ferocious spirit which has imposed ment of that the support of t ion, after a certain date, of the Non-importation Act."—We are sorry to be under the necessity of expressing our doubts of the source of the special content of expressing our doubts of the accuracy of these statements.

Opinions are still at variance respecting the intelligence of the Rochefort squadron having got into the Mediterranean. In the public offices this news is very much doubted. The vessels seen there, if any were so seen, must, it is thought, have been from some other port. It is now said they were three in number and that two of them were frigates—a description not applicable to the Rochefort squadron.

The accounts have been derived from three sources—the Rock schooner, the Cambrian and Melampus frigate, arrived at Plymouth. The Rock had her accounts from an American reselfort squadron and arrived at Toulon. This is impossible, if the ships seen on the 2th January, off Madeira, were the Rochfort squadron. The accounts by the Melampus and Cambrian were brought from our squadron off Cadiz. One of them we believe states that the Rochefort squadron passed the Straits of Gibraltar on the 26th or 27th of January, and another, that it lad arrived near Ernel squadron at sea, and hence has arisen all this doubt and uncertainty. See Richard Strachun is gone into the Melatarrenean in search of the enemy.

Since the arrival of General Miranda, two months ago, a good deal has been said on the subject of invading the province of Caraccas—Mr. Depon's description of that country has been referred to in support of the arguments for this enemy.
