The reafon feems to be that the Auftrians and Ruffians, finding they had to do with an army greatly fin-perior in numbers, deemed it most advisable to all back, because, had they waited the attack, defending the courfe of the Inn, from near Kufflicin to Brannau, they would have been fe-parated and furrounded in detail. They are faid, therefore, to have retreated to Wels, and the French army was left in full march to attack them. Part of the French army, indeed, had not reached the Inn; but by the 29th-190, the papers of the papers
